

Prague, December 27, 2025

Wulf's Christmas letter for the 2025 holiday season

This year, I did find the time to focus on Christmas cards - first in paper and then in digital form. But I am running behind. The paper cards (they were few) were mailed a bit late, and may have arrived after the Christmas holiday. Apologies for that.

Meantime, I got stuck coding the little "Xmas micro-site". This will remain a work in progress, also in preparation for the next Christmas season, and beyond. The "mailto:" and "tel." links don't work on all Android operating systems (made by Google, powering approx. 80% of all smartphones worldwide). The Bolsheviks running that company have no shame! Sorry, but this is outside of my control ...

Eastwards, not too far from here, people are having a disagreement - exemplified by an argument over on what date our Lord Jesus Christ was actually born, or, rather, whether this should be celebrated according to the Gregorian, or the Julian calendar. The disagreement was brought about, in no small measure, by so-called dissidents who had emigrated from the USSR to the USA - in order to then proceed and first of all diss America. That specific crowd, well, they actually don't celebrate Christmas at all. And they remain hard at work spoiling the fun for everyone else. That is, if they are given the opportunity ... So let's at least make sure they understand that Jesus Christ was in fact king of the Jews (cf. I.N.R.I.). Not a joke.

My Christmas card list has names from all over the world, many Americans, Russians, Ukrainians, Frenchmen, Spaniards, Africans, and even some Germans as well. Communication was difficult in recent years, which is why I paused reaching out. I didn't want to lose even more friends over a ridiculous health scare, exacerbated by ignorance, incompetence, and corruption in government and the scientific community. Someone had this planned out beforehand, but things didn't work out the way they planned. Some of my friends have since admitted they had been misled. I didn't even want to be right, I just didn't want them to get hurt.

As 2025 comes to a close, America's reputation is shattered, resting with the crustations on the ocean floor. It really hurts me to spell out this realization, as it must hurt everyone else who truly loves America. Was it really all just a dream? The American dream, that we have now all awakened from ... rubbing our eyes in disbelief?

Let me recount an altercation I had with one gentleman employed at the US Embassy in Prague. My friend was celebrating his birthday at an Irish pub, here in Prague, back in 2017. That is where this discussion took place ... after a pint or two. They were colleagues. And for sure, that gentleman was an anti-Trumpist if there ever was one, and certainly not a Rhino-Republican either. He expressed disbelief that anyone could ever vote for that man, and poured out insults over his countrymen to prove the point. So, clearly, that man was a real "patriot".

Our conversation came to focus on American troop presence in Europe. In the course of that conversation I told him - somewhat facetiously - that if the Russians were ever to attack Europe (btw. Russia is half in - and pretty much half of - Europe), we should just let them in. I said they can run their tank columns all the way to Biarritz on the French Atlantic coast. I further outlined the fact there are well over 440 million people here, compared to 150 million Russians. I explained to the gentleman that this means that, mathematically, 3 Europeans can give every invading Russian a big bear hug and we can all have a big party together. Which is why such an invasion is unlikely to happen, on any unfriendly terms.

The gentleman thus became not so gentle anymore, rather irate, actually. He said I was crazy, publicly called me an idiot, and affirmed in no uncertain terms that Europe needs America's "protection" to assure its very survival. Without American troop presence, we would surely be doomed, he said. He saw it as a given that Russia was the eternal enemy, ready to pounce on Western Europe in a heartbeat. In fact, it seems my statements had triggered somewhat of an identity crisis inside him. He was triggered, that much was clear. We didn't start a fight, but I could have moved things in that direction, had I wanted to ...

Now in 2025, one only needs to ask the Ukrainians what American "protection" is actually worth. Thanks to the profuse incompetence of American generals, commanding the Ukrainian army from behind, well over a million Ukrainians are no longer celebrating Christmas this year. Who can be surprised? Those same generals were soundly defeated by a bunch of wife-beating goat herders in Afghanistan - in a fight that lasted a whole two decades. And all the modern weaponry those (wedding) generals could avail themselves of ended up in the enemy's hands.

The people of Ukraine will open an invoice based on the facts, and it will take Americans a very long time to settle that claim. In fact, America might go broke in the process ... .

Bringing the troops home - if for no other reason than to save some money - is probably a good idea. This should have been done already, a long time ago, even before they overstayed their welcome.

2025 did bring about change in Czech Republic, manifested by election of the new/old prime minister. His party (Association of Unsatisfied Citizens) ran on a ticket of not sending one more Czech crown in military aid to Ukraine. Let's all hope he will keep the promise, with others following his example.

The people are tired of being bullied into war by the Americans and their British "friends" - working hand and hand with their installed shills on the continent. At the very least, don't count on the Czech Republic, which basically came about as a country thanks to American initiative (cf. Wilson's 14 points), to remain a "reliable ally". There is no concurrence with the "Grandma Senator" from South Carolina. Using tax money to kill Russians is not seen as a good "investment" here. When will that man finally be taken to task, for summarily ruining America's reputation?!

In other news, my parents had moved to a place near Hamburg a few years ago. They enjoy every sunny day on their electric bikes. Those bikes cost a fortune, and in my humble opinion run way too fast. A trip to Crete is planned for May, together with my brother. Life is a struggle for him. His brief stint in Afghanistan back in 2006, where Germany - as the ever-so loyal American ally - helped to defend Western civilization (so we were told), wasn't really very good for him.

Germans are now in shock, after the recently published "National Security Strategy" document published by the White House in November this year. This document is basically ridiculing Germany for taking in all those refugees. Americans bombed these people out of their houses, shattered their countries, and made them refugees in the first place. And all the US president is concerned about is that these people were allowed to enter Europe illegally - even if on initiative of Frau Merkel herself. So how about Americans themselves accept responsibility for the people they made homeless? For sure, the American dream is dead. And now a good portion of Americans even feel called upon to deny a new European dream to all those "poor huddled masses, yearning to be free ...". How is this even any of America's business?

"In God We Trust" it says on every dollar bill. Recently, that has not been enough of a promise anymore, for people all over the world to buy treasury bonds. There is an immediate need to sell $US 3 trillion worth of new bonds, in order to cover those that mature early in the new year. Demand is low, so interest will be high (pun intended). At least that is what Col (ret.) Lawrence Wilkerson, formerly Chief of Staff for Colin Powell - now of College of William & Mary, VA - says. The established business model of running a country simply by pulling money out of a hat may come to an end rather soon.

In coming months and years, that is in fact all we may have left: trust in God. Let it not be shaken, or overshadowed by belief in false gods, even a dance around the golden calf. Turning off the TV is a good first step in that direction.

Please celebrate the day Christ was born, to Mary and Joseph, in a stable in Bethlehem. And never let anyone deny you the right to do so.

Merry Christmas, with Best Wishes for 2026, and beyond!

P.S. the photo actually shows the Christmas market at České Budějovice, one of the many smaller towns outside Prague, where tourists like to visit. It used to be called Budweis, by the predominantly German-speaking population (they didn't leave voluntarily). The original Budweiser beer "Budvar" is brewed here, at the state-owned brewery "Budějovický Budvar, n. p.". Come have a taste - and you will never touch that dish-washing water they sell you by the same name, ever again.

The Christmas card tradition has come a bit out of fashion. But we should occasionally exercise it - if for no other reason than to keep the postal services busy. We might need them some day ...

That said, doing things online makes it a lot easier. You can use the QR code to pull up this web link on your smartphone:

xmas.office-prague.net

Addresses and phone numbers might change, but I'll make an effort to keep that page updated with the latest details. Next year, Christmas cards might be in digital format. To be on the mailing list, send an e-mail to:

wulf-xmas@office-prague.net

The Christmas card tradition has come a bit out of fashion. But we should occasionally exercise it - if for no other reason than to keep the postal services busy. We might need them some day ...

That said, doing things online makes it a lot easier. You can use the QR code to pull up this web link on your smartphone:

xmas.office-prague.net

Addresses and phone numbers might change, but I'll make an effort to keep that page updated with the latest details. Next year, Christmas cards might be in digital format. To be on the mailing list, send an e-mail to:

wulf-xmas@office-prague.net